

I've been replaying Donkey Kong Country recently and I'm still amazed at how good the graphics are. While the new games are fun, I still find the original trilogy more atmospheric because of how good the backgrounds look (combined with the incredible music and sound effects). I imagine using pre-rendered backgrounds are easier now compared to the 90s (and would be a lot better) so I'm surprised no games to my knowledge do it anymore. So I'm pretty new to Unity and I'm having some trouble conceptualizing how to implement more complex, larger background images that are non-repeating. Most of the content and tutorials I'm reading discuss tiled and repeating pixel backgrounds, but what if I'm looking to create an environment that has more of a "painted" feel like Broken Age. Is it even feasible to make a large monolithic background in a platformer or are you essentially constrained to repeating backgrounds due to memory constraints? Also, I understand it's performant to keep image sizes constrained to powers of 2. Does this rule mean that my background landscape's dimensions would need to all be a power of 2? If anyone could give some insight that would be great, thanks. Image: Red Candle Games Red Candle Games is best known for its work on psychological horror games like Detention and (the highly controversial) Devotion, but it's making a big swerve for its next project, Nine Sols. The Taiwanese developer announced its next project on Thursday, calling it a "2D action platformer with Sekiro-inspired deflection-focused combat." The developer is, of course, referring to FromSoftware's samurai action game, Sekiro: Shadows Die Twice, which requires fast reflexes and patience to prevail in combat. On social media, Red Candle further describes Nine Sols as a "lore rich" and "hand-drawn" Asian fantasy. "[E]xplore the land once home to an ancient alien race, and follow a vengeful hero's quest to slay the 9 Sols, formidable rulers of this forsaken realm." The developer also released a piece of artwork for Nine Sols, showing a catlike creature staring at its own reflection in a pool of blood. While the character appears to exist in a futuristic, cyberpunk world, the environment reflecting in the pool appears to be hyper-natural, with floating mountains and a large moon in the deep background. Image: Red Candle Games Back in March, Red Candle posted a short video teaser of a work-in-progress project, which appears to match Nine Sols' description. Red Candle Games did not announce a release window or platforms for Nine Sols. The developer released 2017's Detention on a variety of PC, mobile, and console platforms, while its follow-up game, 2019's Devotion, was for Mac and Windows PC only.
